Weather Summary

- High pressure will strengthen through the weekend delivering dry conditions and sunny skies. The stable conditions will trap pollutants in the lower levels during the overnight and early morning hours resulting in areas of haze or patchy fog. Temperatures will be well above normal topping out in the upper 60s to mid 70s for Saturday through Monday, cooling into the 40s at night. Our main concerns for public safety continue to focus on dangerous beach conditions and potential for rip currents and large shore breaks through Sunday.
- Minimal weather impacts expected through the weekend.
- Dangerous Beach Conditions: Heightened threat of rip currents and large shore break through Sunday. With the near record highs and many visitors to the area, there will be a concern for dangerous beach conditions.

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

A stretch of dry weather will occur over Northern California through Wednesday as a high pressure regime sets up. A noticeable warming trend begins today and continues the next several days across Northern California. Near-record temperatures are possible by Monday. A gradual cool down is expected later in the week, when some showers over the northern mountains and into the northern Sacramento Valley are possible.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Santa Ana Conditions are expected to strengthen Sunday evening into Monday, bringing the potential for extreme fire danger that may last through Sunday. Fire Weather Watches are in effect for much of Ventura and Los Angeles counties. Northeast winds are expected to gust to around 50 mph across the mountains and to around 40 mph for the coastal and valley areas that are prone to Santa Ana winds. Locally higher gusts will be possible. Relative Humidities during the daytime will fall into the teens with isolated single digits, with poor overnight recoveries. These conditions could bring the potential for rapid fire growth and extreme fire behavior if ignition occurs. The gusty northeast winds may also result in downed tree limbs and localized power outages in areas prone to Santa Ana winds, as well as hazardous cross-winds for motorists.
